header is a flex container. put display:flex on it in css. it has two children, the logo and the nav. they will flow into a row once their parent has display:flex on it. make them vertical center using align-center on their parent in css

| div class="logo" | <nav></nav> | this is a flex container. it has three main children: column large, column medium, and column small. give it a class name like "content" this is a container inside the "content" container. it has 2 classes, column and large. give those classes css. column will have display: flex and flex-direction: column. large will have 630px width this is a div with class lead-story this is a div with a background image. make one class that adds the height and the background image. make a second class that does the text formatting. add both classes to this div this is a p with lorem ipsum in it for placeholder text this is a div with class articles. it is a flex container. make it have 2 children with class "article". make articles have display: flex; and justify-content: space-between;

article class: display: flex; flex-direction: column;

inside article: orca text

also inside article: background img

article class: display: flex; flex-direction: column;

inside article: burger for bkfst

also inside article: background img

this is a container inside the "content" container. it has 2 classes, column and medium. give those classes css. column will have display: flex and flex-direction: column. medium will have 300px width fbi story gets class article cats in control gets class article this is a container inside the "content" container. it has 2 classes, column and small. column will have display: flex and flex-direction: column. small will have 240px width cookie img

news bites

Footer